The improbability of a malicious story serves but to help forward the currency of itô because it increases the scandalô So that in such instances, the world, like Romish Priests are industrious to propagate a belief in things they have not the least faith themselves; or like a pious S^t. Austin who said he ôbelieved some things were because they were absurd and impossible.ö

Manner of trying waterô With Galls, Syrup of Violets, or oil of Tartar per deliquiumô any unexperienced water may be examined, by dropping a little Syrup of Violets, and if this does not alter its color by chang^g it red if acid is in the water, or green if alkali presides; if no such change is wrought, but continues its natural natural blueness, the water is neither acid nor alkaline. If galls do not turn the water black, it is not irony nor vitriolic; and if oil of tartar does not precipitate a white powder, the water holds no considerable proportion of earthy matter. A Solution of Silver by causing a thickness or light precipitation, discovers a minute proportion of Sea Salt contained in waters. Evaporation, or bringing the solid contents of water to a dry form a means of discovering with what it is impregnated, whether with salt, mineral, or earth, etc.

One's memory with a multitude of things at the expenses of one's judgement. He does not apply himself to the most learned Writings, in order to acquire knowledge; but the most rational, to fortify his reason. Sometimes he chuses the most delicate, to render his own taste so, sometimes the most agreeable, to give the same turn to his own genius. It remains that I describe him such as he is in Friendship and Religion. In Friendship, he is more constant than a philosopher, and more sincere than a young Man of good nature without experience.

As to Religion

Justice and Charity supply the place
Of rigid Penance, and a formal Face.
His piety, without inflicted Pains,
Flows easy, and Austerity disdains.
God only is the object of his Care
Whom goodness leaves no room for black despair:
Within the Bosom of kind Providence,
He places his repose, his bliss & sure defence.

M. De St. Evremo[n]d's character of himself.

A Philosopher equally remote from superstition and Impiety: A Voluptuary, who has no less aversion for Debauchery, than Inclination for Pleasure; one, who never felt the pressure of Indigence, who was never acquainted with Plenty. He lives in a condition, despised by them who have everything, envied by those who have nothing, relished by those who make their reason the foundation of their happiness. When he was young he hated for of useness; being persuaded that Wealth is necessary for the Convenience of a long life: Now he is old, he can hardly endure thriftiness; being of opinion, that want is little to be dreaded, when a man has but little time left to the miserable. He is well pleas'd with Nature, and does not complain of Fortune. He hates Vice, is indulgent to Frailties, and laments Misfortunes. He searches not after the Frailties of Men with design to expose them, he finds out their Ridicule only for his own Diversion: He has a secret pleasure in perceiving this himself he wou'd have yet a greater in discovering it to others were he not check'd by Discretion. Life, in his opinion, is too short to read all sorts of Books, and to burden
